英 語

1. 次の英文を読んで、設問に答えよ。

When *Clara Campoamor was growing up in Spain at the end of the nineteenth century, women did not have many of the basic rights that men had. They could not vote in elections and they received much lower pay for similar work. Married women were under their husbands' control — for example, a married woman was not allowed to open a business, own a house, or change her address without the agreement of her husband. It was also extremely difficult for a woman to end her marriage by getting a divorce from her husband.

Many people believed that women were only supposed to get married, have children, and spend most of their time at home. This was not an unusual situation for women around the world at this time. So, when Campoamor was born in Madrid in 1888, it was expected that she would follow this same path. However, when Campoamor was only ten years old, her father died suddenly, leaving her mother to be the main earner for her young family. At the age of thirteen, Campoamor had to leave school in order to help her mother. This involved long hours of sewing and making clothes to earn money. She was left to read and study alone, disappointed that she could no longer be at school with her friends.

Although she had left education early, Campoamor was very intelligent and hard-working, and her natural abilities and careful planning helped her to become successful in her working life. From the age of twenty, she worked in government jobs in different parts of Spain, and in 1914, at the age of twenty-five, she came top in a special government exam. This allowed her to return home to Madrid as a teacher of secretaries in a government school for adults.

During this time, Campoamor frequently had more than one job, and one of these extra jobs came at an important moment in her life. After her return to Madrid, Campoamor found a job as a reporter on the newspaper La Tribuna. It was there that she became very interested in politics and women's rights, and she started to dream of equality for women in Spain. Soon, she was meeting other women from across the country who all wanted one thing — to change the lives of Spanish women by getting equality for women in all parts of the law and getting the right to vote. But how could they achieve this?

Becoming a lawyer was going to be a long journey for Campoamor, who had not completed her early education and was not from a rich family who could help her. But she worked hard at evening classes to get the education that she needed. Sometimes, she had to do extra jobs to pay for the classes, too, but in only four years, she got a degree. Then she went to law school, and finally became a lawyer in 1924. She began to work, and in 1928 she became the first woman lawyer to appear in front of the most important judges in the country. It was an extraordinary achievement and the result of years of careful hard work, proving how determined she was to make a difference to the lives of other women in Spain.

In 1931, at the age of forty-three, she became one of only three women *deputies in the Spanish Parliament. On the 1st of October 1931, Campoamor famously spoke to the Spanish Parliament. She was the first woman ever to speak there, and before she began, she looked at all the other deputies around her — there were 470 men and only one other woman. She looked down for a moment at the carefully prepared words in front of her, then she began to speak loudly and clearly about the desperate need for Spanish women to have the right to vote.

When Campoamor had finished speaking, many of the other deputies did not show their agreement or thank her. Instead, they said that women were not serious or responsible enough to have the right to vote. Even some men from her own political party agreed with these terrible ideas. But when the final moment came for the deputies to vote on this important question, the results were very clear. 188 deputies chose not to vote at all, 121 deputies voted against women having the vote, but most importantly, 161 deputies voted for women's right to vote!

Clara Campoamor had won the vote for women in her country. Of course, other people had played an important part in this moment too, but Campoamor's determined and endless work, as well as the unforgettable way that she spoke to the Spanish Parliament, had had a very decisive effect. On the 19th of November 1933, Campoamor finally achieved her dream when there were national elections to decide who would lead the country. In towns, cities, and villages across Spain, women stood in long queues, proudly waiting to vote for the first time. In many places, there were more women than men, with over six million women voting for the very first time.

As both a lawyer and a government deputy, Clara Campoamor made a truly important difference to women in her country. From early in her adult life, this very intelligent woman knew that she needed to spend many years studying, training, and working before she could help others. But she did not stop, always taking carefully planned steps towards equality for women, until she achieved her biggest goal. ㋞ In helping to win the right to vote for women in Spain, Campoamor changed the lives of Spanish people and politics forever.
